Neuse River Basin Modeling Update – The Chair opened the discussion on the draft Neuse River Watershed Model and noted the table in the agenda package that illustrates how the draft transport factors could affect the end of pipe nitrogen allocations if implemented. The positive effect would be an increase in end of pipe discharges in the upper portions of the watershed but a decrease for discharges in the middle portions of the basin. Haywood noted that the draft model, if nothing else, proved that the existing transport factors adopted in 1997-98 as part of the Neuse Management Strategy were, and are, very close to correct.
